ABOUT YOUR HOME

By Frances Dell

Something new for the house "that has everything" is the last word in comfort at the water's edge—a pool house.
A play house by the edge of the pool is no longer a luxury of just a few families with large estates. With the increase in the number of family pools it is only natural that the number of pool houses have increased.
A pool with a pool house will turn your home into a summer resort where you make your own rules. The pool house may be an unpretentious roofless dressing room or may be a small house used for week-end guests.
The best type of furniture for a pool playhouse should be easy to care for. It is best made of wrought iron, aluminum, redwood, rattan or chrome, easy to care for upholstery of plastic and sailcloth will be a joy.
This all sounds a bit grand, but remember pools are becoming cheaper to install each year. After a pool, a pool house is the next step.

Earth's Rumbling Said Quite Normal

WASHINGTON—Mt. Etna spews hot sand. Fuego hurls a pall of ash over central Guatemala. Several tremors rock San Francisco, the Aleutians, and Manchuria.
Shaken spectators of nature's fireworks might well wonder whether Vulcan is working overtime this year. Traditional hot spots, such as Fuego, have been rekindled. However, statisticians say the situation seems to be normal—if not quiet—along the earth's notorious "Belts of Fire."
The Coast and Geodetic Survey, which keeps one ear to the trembling earth, has listed 266 major earthquakes during early 1957 as compared to 299 during an identical period of time last year.
As for volcanoes, our planet is—quite literally—letting off a normal amount of steam. No more than a handful of the earth's 450 active volcanoes speaks at once.

Autos Cripple More Children Than Polio

Automobile accidents make cripples of 25 times as many children as polio does. They involve more than 2,000,000 people a year, killing about 36,000 of them, and costing over $2,000,000. Yet highway officials say that 85 per cent of all traffic accidents could be prevented.
One clear-cut way to attack this vital problem is through the visual factor. Some 3,000,000 American drivers have such poor eyesight that they are a menace on the road at any time. And about 17,500,000 additional drivers have substandard vision. The accident toll would be cut down tremendously if every motorist had frequent eyesight examinations and followed the specialist's advice about any seeing faults which were discovered. Most drivers could be brought up to par by glasses or other means. Some with uncorrectable visual errors could learn to compensate for them and thus pilot their cars safely, at least under certain conditions.

Independence Is Old Story for Ethopia

WASHINGTON—Ethopia, mountainous and isolated on the northeast shoulder of Africa, boasts one of the world's oldest traditions of independence. Italy's brief, six-year conquest that ended in 1941 marks the only break in more than 2,000 years of Ethopian sovereignty.
The African kingdom has an equally ancient tradition of Christianity, having embraced the Coptic form in 330 A.D. The Egyptian Coptic Patriarch formerly headed the Ethopian Church, but in 1952 the Ethopians obtained their own Archbishop.

Miss Stoneburner Has Had Career of Service In Church Mission Work in India

Miss Ella May Stoneburner is spending some time at her home on Route One, Appomattox, with her mother, Mrs. Effie Stoneburner, after returning to the States from several years of interesting service in the mission fields of India.
Mis Stoneburner is a native of the Valley of Virginia. She won her Bachelor's Degree at Washington, D. C. Missionary College, and now plans to earn her Master's Degree at the College of Medical Evangelists at La Malina, California, before returning to the mission work in India.
The story of her fascinating years of Christian service in India reveals the mark of a dedicated life.
In 1948 she went to China to serve in the mission work of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which maintains extensive and far-flung Christian missions. She arrived in Shanghai and became a nurse in the Seventh-day Advenist Mission.
In December of that year, Communists forces took over in Shanghai, and Miss Stoneburner and other mission workers were flown out by the famed Flying Tigers of General Clare Chenault. She landed in Hong Kong and then went to Canton. There she studied the Chinese language until August 1949, but was transferred to India, and had to spend another year mastering the language of that country.
In India, she became located at Nuzvid, in the southeastern part of India, north of Madras. She spent four months in charge of nurses in a hospital in the Himalaya mountains, and then returned to the Gifford Memorial Hospital in Nuzvid. This is a 120-bed hospital in a city of some 12,000 population, in almost jungle-like country. It is 14 miles from the nearest railroad, the principal means of transportation. She aided in teaching and training native nurses. The Seventh-day Adventist Church operates a most successful mission there, and Miss Stoneburner has been very active since her return to the States in reporting to church groups on the Christian mission work in India and its many problems. She has many slides and movies of this activity, which add greatly to her report of the work there. A school of midwifery, and training of laboratory technicians are features of the church medical program.
Miss Stoneburner spent four years in Nuzvid before returning to the States in 1952. In 1953 she went back to her work. After her present stay in the States, she says, she will return once again to Nuzvid, for she believes that the challenging opportunities for Christian service there offer her a useful career.
Miss Stoneburner has found time to study the traditions and customs of the people of India, and her appraisal of conditions there form an informative sidelight to her Christian mission work. She says India is making considerable progress, but that the Communist menace is ever present. A tide of nationalism prevails in the country, and Americans face many difficulties in winning the friendship of the new generation in India. Rice, tobacco and mangoes are principal products in the area of India wherein she has worked. Transportation and mechanization are very backward, with water buffalo and the bullock as greatly-used work animals. She reports that progress is being made in doing away with the rigid caste system, and the power of a few rich family families is being lessened. The new generation is interested in education, but the sheer poverty of the great mass of the population is evident on every hand. That makes much greater the challenge of the Christian mission. She reports that many are being won to Christianity through the work of her church, and that she is confident that their conversion is sincere and lasting.
During her years in India, Miss Stoneburner has been able to take vacation trips into various parts of the vast nation. She reports of her visit to the Kashmir as a highlight of her travels.
Appomattox County is fortunate to have here at this time one who has such a wealth of experience in mission work, Pastor W. P. Lawrence, of the Appomattox Seventh-day Adventist Church, invites the people to all services and lectures in which Miss Stoneburner participates while in Appomattox.

PROBLEM WITH SHEEP
VPI specialists explain that sheep normally store up a good supply of vitamin A from green pasture during the grazingseaso n, but that because of dry weather during the summeer pastures were low in vitamin A.
Symptoms of the deficiency are blindness, a watery discharge from the eyes, dead l ambs or weak lambs that die shortly after birth.
Green pasture, green leafy legume hay, and yellow corn are the best sources of the vitamin.
The best insurance against any trouble would be to provide winter pasture for the ewes, and feed high quality legume hay, starting a month before lambing.
